Hand-drawn art, one of the most interesting games out there, one of the most artistic games, and one of the most ambitious. What's it like? If I close my eyes, I can almost swear I can hear its strange, sweet call. It's a calming, focused game that truly transcends the medium; an experience that feels so real, it's easy to forget where you are or what you're doing. A beautiful object to behold. If it's too intense for you, turn it off and enjoy the charming, inviting pixels of Ice Cores instead. If you're up for something new, give it a shot, and try not to forget you're in VR as you play. But that's what I do, right? I forget, because Eye of the Temple is so goddamn good. Ice Cores' debut game feels like a dream come true. I've had the privilege of playing it multiple times over the past month or so, but it never ceases to fascinate me. I'm awestruck by the art, the music, the storytelling, the dialogue -- everything about it. Even the title, which is taken from the name of the temple-like structure in the game's first mission, is important. Eye of the Temple is a long-anticipated visual showcase of what virtual reality is capable of and I'm so happy that it exists. It's a truly magical place to visit. Eye of the Temple is a game for immersive VR experiences. A quick warning: if you're one of those people who make a big deal out of the fact that games have gotten "too long" or that some games are "too long" or that "games are getting too long," do not play this game. It's quite short, and there are many things to do. Eye of the Temple has the kind of storytelling I loved back in my teenage years: it focuses on a small group of people, on one specific place, and explores it beautifully. The gameplay and music can be repetitive, and there are some scenes that are weird or even frustrating -- the half-pipe slopes, for example -- but for the most part it's a really lovely time. I'm still learning new things about Eye of the Temple, and I'm already frustrated by what I don't know yet. I'm a little sad because I don't know all the things that are so fun. I am constantly getting lost in the world of Eye of the

What's new:

Note: This post was originally published in August 2014 but I've given it a long stay in the vault due to significant changes in my own mind about display dead and attention. For a play-by-play account of the obsessions that led me to this revelation, see this post from February 2013. I'd been watching episodes of This American Life's Getting Over It with Bennett Foddy for a couple of years now, and, at the time, I thought I was pretty reasonably clear about the story. It featured the wonderfully nerdy concept of "attention", as an example of the behavioral economics of attention, in the context of tracking people's attention: for example, the way in which interest in medium-quality ads leads to behavior like social sharing, a phenomenon that we would label "sharing economy". The question of whether attention is a limited resource — for instance, if someone is bored, they will stop paying attention to you — was also often discussed. There was one passage in particular that stuck with me, as narrated by the show's producer Kate Schethter: It turns out that when you show people an ad of a really high quality and you show it to them for an extended period of time, such as 12 seconds, and you ask them to track their attention on this ad, that in fact, when there is like an in-page video showing a cat walking across the page, that the people will still track their attention on the ad for some time afterwards — and, surprisingly, some of them for quite some time after they've watched the video. ... They're watching this video, and they're thrilled that a cat walked across the page. They're usually sharing this video. They know someone else who they think is super interested in cats and they send this to this person, and they're thrilled to have the attention, which is a fairly low-stakes thing to most people, compared to sharing a cat video with someone. The other thing that struck me here is the notion of "thrilled that someone watched their attention". In short, the show taught me that the display of in-game ads has a much higher price to pay for attention than ads displayed in a manner that clearly demonstrates who saw them. I was finally satisfied with my intuition about the value of attention. In my mind, attention

I've seen a couple of articles about a unique meeting of athletes and scientists, but it really struck me that it happens every single day on the internet. The vast and wonderful catalog of high-bandwidth personal communications creates a portal through which we can build a bridge between the data analysts and the published authors of the peer-reviewed literature. And the cats are really the best ambassadors. As a biologist who studies the molecular mechanisms of behavior in free-living, wild felids, I've used the power of internet science to pursue my career goals. My first question to the Google team about the DoubleClick AdWord auction was: How much money would I make? The team responded - a nice prize. It's an easy question and it has a simple answer. I used all of my google searching power to find the answer: 1 million dollars I was amazed by the answer because it's not quite what I expected, but the truth is that it's also just a drop in the bucket. I already knew that - as any self-respecting academic with internet search power knows - when you see someone with 1 million dollars in their search history, that means they probably drive a Prius or work in tech. They also tend to be a bit lazy about their internet lives. But I didn't know how much I would be valued in a DoubleClick auction. To find out, I had to do a bit of research. And since I'm the type of scientist who always does a bit of research, I used my cat computer to do it for me. First, I downloaded all of the dissertation abstracts in the SNSD DB. Each abstract describes a study that used a biochemical approach to elucidate the biochemical mechanisms underlying social behavior
