What's new in Elden Ring:

Fri, 26 Oct 2008 10:13:35 +0000All That's Wrong with This Generation of Video Games>The idea of the Videogame is simple. Provide a system of interconnected game play involving a set of characters where the players compete against each other to solve a scenario given to them in the game. But, over the years this idea has been bungled. First of all as people expanded their ambitions beyond just playing the game, the gamers concept expanded. This led to the term "Gamer". Many games adopted gamer and gamer culture like moves and shirts. This lead to the term "Over Grouch" or "Weak will game" being used to describe the uncaring and unsympathetic gamers.

This became an issue for game companies because many gamers were the model by which an entire group was judged. This was at the same time the game companies were tying their brands to the gamer culture. Well, problems ensued. Many gamers of a certain "pop" of the culture started to get angry at game companies that decided to cater to their tastes. Most cases there has been a slew of think pieces written about how games are the new MTV. In the past this would have been written off as a harmless brattish kind of thing, even in the past many management magazines would have "Let them eat cake" attitude towards this kind of criticism. But, times have changed. Today, certain magazines have written articles on how the mainstream game company will be the replacement for the Catholic Church in 10 or 20 years. There have been other cases where companies have actually made apologies for a bad game by claiming they "were not aware of the current community".

Over the years certain video game executives have grew tired of the vitriol of the press, marketing managers at one point were actually going to curtail marketing of titles that didn't sell well. And, increasingly the game company also just saw the gamers as a means of making money. Some companies, like Electronic Arts, even had talks about charging a monthly fee to the gamer. All this came to a head with the megaurav of the mid 90's, Occurrence and Propagation of Caerulomyces Bacillus Spoilers in a Dairy Herd. Data were collected from a continuous-feeding, high-yielding dairy farm with 18 lactating cows over 4 yr. Intact-colostrum samples (from parity 1 and 2) were obtained at parturition and during the first 2 wk of lactation for weekly examination for the presence of Caerulomyces spoilage organisms. During the first 2 wk of lactation, colostrum samples were also obtained from all parities and from the whole cow 4 times per yr and from the lowest lactation cow each day of the milking period. Caerulomyces-positive samples were cultured on 50-mil-diameter multiplates prepared from low-fat, skimmed milk-based commercial starter cultures. Samples from the cows' different parities were combined into 1 mixed-parity group; a second mixed-parity group was made of samples from the first week of lactation from all cows. Samples of colostrum were combined into 1 colostrum group. As many as 52 Caerulomyces-positive samples were isolated, 45 from the mixed-parity group and 7 from the colostrum group. When the same culture preparations were supplemented with new feeds (
