Netsend is the fastest way to send (including broadcast) messages on a LAN. It only uses the well-known socket interface and doesn't implement its own networking protocol. For large multicast and broadcast messages, you can also use the OAM protocol which is very fast. While receiving messages you can click on a message to display its contents in a GUI, or you can do it on-the-fly when all messages are listed in the main window. Besides the interface (message text, date and time, content of the message...) you can also save or import message databases. As Netsend is run in your LAN, you can also transfer files to and from other computers, broadcast a PING or go to the WWW with URL sharing. Main features: * Multiple options to choose between sending or receiving messages. * Sending and receiving messages with the same options and on the same computer. * Direct access to the OAM protocol for large message transfers. * Display and edit the message text and content in the main window. * Displaying the date and time of the message when sending or receiving. * Importing and exporting databases of pre-saved message texts. * Translation of message content in the main window. * Saving and restoring message contents of a database in other database files. * Sending messages to named computers. * Sending messages with any content and title (using the text or the HTML format). * Short text support for messages longer than 160 characters. * Importing message databases on different computers. * Direct access to send and receive messages using the OAM protocol. * Displaying the contents of the shared directory when sending messages. * Displaying the contents of the shared directory when receiving messages. * Displaying the shared directory only when sending messages. * Saving and restoring shared message databases to the shared directory. * Automatic registration to the user directory when accessing OAM protocol. * Automatic blocking of the shared directory when accessing OAM protocol. * A built-in HTTP server which can send the contents of a shared directory and can also receive information from the WWW. * Modify the file directory for messages received. * Printing and sending messages. * Sending messages to a file with time stamp. * Sending messages when a program is starting and also in the background of a program. * Sending messages every specified number of seconds. *
