This week I was talking with Marcus about a related software problem. This problem happens when you migrate data to a cluster using something like Dask. This is a problem that is great for Scaling and it certainly explains why workers are so important to the cluster. The way that Dask works is by putting workers in containers, connecting to the cluster, and then downloading files from a data store and processing them. When you put your data in a data store it's no longer in the same worker as your other data, so the workers have no way to access your data, even if they are the same type of data. A related problem, sometimes not as big a deal and maybe not even a problem. The issue with this is that you have to put all of your data in your local data store. The data store can be one of several types of data store. It might not be that bad if you have a small amount of data, but what happens when you have a large amount of data. Imagine that you have a large amount of data, where each worker puts all of their data in a different data store that has to be connected to the cluster. The workers are no longer able to perform IO and are effectively useless. Instead of being able to scale, you actually increase the cost of running the cluster because all the workers are tied up talking to the cluster and aren't processing the data. There are several options for dealing with this. The first is
