Crack.World Machine Professional Edition CRACK.Lennie Mintz, an ex-convict and the current mayor of Columbia, South Carolina, represents the Republican Party in South Carolina. Last week, he made the party's arguments in defense of the state's controversial "birther" law, which requires applicants for voter registration to prove their citizenship by providing proof of legal US citizenship in the form of a birth certificate. "If you don't have any kind of paper work that says that you were born in the United States, you're a citizen, fine," he said on Fox News's "Special Report." "But you need to be a citizen. And to ask me, as an elected official, to certify that you are a citizen is outrageous. It's unconstitutional. It's a violation of our most fundamental law." Mintz's law — which has been under attack by Democrats in South Carolina since it was passed in 2011 — has been declared unconstitutional, but it's still on the books. Mintz's comments are proof that Republicans don't seem to know what it means to be an elected official, and that they've lost the political fight on the question of citizenship. It's not that I'm surprised to hear Democrats tell lies about Republicans, that's a given. But what happened to South Carolina's Mayor? Mintz's comments echo those of other Republican officials and politicians
