"The balance of probabilities is clearly in favor of the continuation of this long-term uptrend, and momentum traders with a bullish outlook should look to add accordingly," says Ben Rowney, Co-founder of derivatives trading platform, BFX Brokerage, and outspoken technical trader and analyst. "The bear markets of 2002-2007 and 2014-present, though the latter was particularly severe, did not have the same degree of verticalization as the present one. This is a bear market unlike anything we've seen in the past. Of course, as many astute traders know, it's important to trade with the grain of the pattern, not the grain of the market." Before we dive into the charts and look at some of the important technical levels which will likely shape the price of Bitcoin over the coming weeks, it might be helpful to first take a step back and ask a question we posed to ourselves: Why is the number one coin in a popular cryptocoin pricing ranking having such a meteoric and utterly unprecedented rise? To answer this question, we have to take a look at what really makes up the price of Bitcoin. The Ticker Bitcoin is a digital currency which is mined through the use of huge amounts of computer power (i.e., computational power). This mining involves entering valid blocks which are replicated over time through the use of something called the blockchain, which makes an unalterable record of all transactions carried out. Each individual block is like a mini-financial version of the Ledger Book from Harry Potter. As of the last update on February 27, 2018, there are just over 11 million Bitcoin available for public use, having sold off 2.4 billion of the available supply over the last three months. There are now 2.4 billion available, but
