The N15 phage infects Escherichia coli, isolated from a commensal strain, was found to be a quasi-T3 phage (N15 phages are related to coliphages T4 and T5) in a similarity tree analysis, although morphological features suggest it represents a new phage species. N15 phages show strong immunity to the related coliphage T4 and fail to grow on N15-derived mutants. N15 phages are able to grow at 18 degrees C, yet show very little growth at 42 degrees C, exhibiting phage N15 thermosensitivity. This thermosensitivity correlates with a thermolabile host-encoded enzyme, phage N15 thermosensitive-enzyme (PST-1). The recA gene is located near PST-1. Western blot analysis showed the gene product of PST-1 to be a 55,000 Da protein. N15 phage is not only capable of lysing an E. coli strain containing a temperature-sensitive allele of recA, but is also able to grow on this temperature-sensitive strain at elevated temperature.Noncovalent adsorption of poly(2-ethyl-2-oxazoline) to surface-modified nanoparticles: implications for nanoparticle surface engineering. The adsorption of poly(2-ethyl-2-oxazoline) (PEOX) was studied in view of its implication for the synthesis of robust nanomaterials. The major goal was to reach a full understanding of the mechanisms of PEOX adsorption in the case of PEOX-modified nanoparticles (NPs). Highly monodisperse and low-emissive PEOX-modified silica NPs were produced via a one-step process. These NPs exhibit ideal thermal stability and very low aggregation because of the covalent attachment of PEOX. Adsorption mechanisms of PEOX on these NPs were probed using Fourier transform infrared spectroscopy and light scattering techniques. PEOX was found to adsorb onto the NPs surface in an electrostatically driven process by 0cc13bf012

I was wondering if it's possible to do this while keeping Exchange 2003's inbox folder and calendar? Would that be possible and where could I find more info on this? A: Yes, you can. I would recommend that you move off of 2003 as soon as possible, since you are looking at the end of its support cycle. 2008 can be run as a 32-bit version and so will not require a 64-bit version of the OS. The move of a 2003 to 2008 can be done gradually, and you can simply upgrade all of your clients to 2008. You can migrate your users, and the users are not removed from 2003. They just are no longer members of the 2003 version of the security group. If you want to clean things up completely, you can delete all but one exchange server from the 2003 group and make the remaining server the manager. You can then configure the remaining 2003 server as a 2003-only server for all purposes except as an active/online server. A: Yes, Exchange 2003 can run on Server 2008, and Server 2008 can run as 32-bit.
