If you're new to Photoshop and can work with it only with a mouse, then CS6 is not the right program for you. Microsoft Office Microsoft Office is a complex package that includes Word, Excel, Outlook, and PowerPoint. All of these programs have an extensive user base and are commonly used by businesspeople to create documents and perform a variety of other tasks. Office is also more of a business-oriented application. Home users don't need Office, but you can still get a fair amount of work done with it. Many of Office's applications can be run on a Mac as well, but it won't be as user friendly. For example, Word uses a different user interface than Excel, so using Word on a Mac is a different process than using the Microsoft Office applications on a PC. You also have to purchase a copy of Office separately for Mac OS X. When a word appears in a web address, it's referring to the program Word. Many Macintosh users don't realize that they have to pay a separate licensing fee for Office. There's a similar issue with Excel and its Excel for the Mac application. You have to purchase a copy of Excel separately from Microsoft for Mac OS X. Similarly, PowerPoint does use a different GUI on a Mac than on a PC. Many people new to the Mac choose to stick with using Microsoft Office on a PC because they're familiar with it. And if you have a Mac laptop, you can use the free version of PowerPoint on your Mac. Access to Microsoft Office is fairly easy to obtain. Many home and business users already have a license to use Office with their computers. For example, if your computer is running Microsoft Windows XP, you can run Office 2003, 2004, or 2007. Many computers, including new ones, already come with Office

Q: Migrating LINQ to SQL to entity framework Here's my question : I have a database with its original SQL tables and I would like to use an entity framework. I created the database using sql server and the two tables have been created there. In the database, there is a column called BureauticName and that's the same table name of the entity in the entity framework. So what to do in this case? Please don't tell me to create a view and tell me what I can do. The problem is with the code I wrote in the beginning. A: You can create new tables in the entity framework or have an existing SQL db create a new view you can point to in your entity framework. If you do not want to have the existing tables recreated through a view then you need to set up your dbml files. If you can leave the existing tables intact you should be able to use this tutorial
