For those who want to work from their favorite creative apps, Adobe is introducing Photoshop on the web, enabling consumers to enjoy optimized experience and professional quality with collaborative simplicity. Users will find that in addition to the standard set of tools, popular industry-leading content and retouching tools from their favorite creative apps are seamlessly available as they edit in any web browser, anywhere. "With this release, the Adobe Creative [App] Suite has a new level of integration and fluidity with desktop and mobile," said Chris Holland, Principal Product Manager at Adobe. "Consumers can use their favorite apps to create, but then share their work instantly on the web. Although we're focused on designing the best experience with the Photoshop desktop app, we are offering an enhanced experience across creative apps whether the user is on the desktop, iOS or Android." The desktop desktop app is more than twice the size of the previous version, allowing users to work with a larger canvas and more options in the workspace. By relieving the pressure of clutter within the workspace, users can focus on the one thing they want to do, even while collaborating. The biggest benefit of the desktop app is its intuitive, yet powerful editing tools such as Content-Aware Fill, a magic wand-like tool that intelligently replaces holes in an image. With Content-Aware Fill Preview, users can preview the result of a content-aware fill before they apply the edit.

With the latest launch of Photoshop CC, Adobe is offering four different subscription tiers, ranging from Creative Cloud Plus to the single-app plan. And that's not all: the company is also adding the option of a subscription plan covering non-Photoshop software as well, filling the gap once occupied by Creative Cloud. The idea is to offer its customers access to a broader set of apps tied to their Creative Cloud account. The tie-in is similar to apps that are sponsored by Google's G Suite, Amazon's WorkSpaces and now Microsoft's Office 365. Although Photoshop CC 2018 is no longer officially being referred to as having features including a New Perspective Panoramic mode, the company left that label on its website, and it's likely to stick. The term is still not official, but the company plastered it on its website even after announcing the new features of the software. The perspective mode uses a radial projected blend between the image and the surrounding background. And for the first time, you can also use the new 72-tap Brush panel to create a radial brush, which works best with the mode. According to the company, Prospective Match and Album Match functions can be used together to view slices of a photo or video when working without the need to adjust the aspect ratio of the canvas to the original image size. If you're in a creative business and Photoshop is an important tool, then you need not worry that Adobe is going to introduce a change that you would consider a drag on usability. The reason is that Photoshop is crafted to cater to professionals, not casual users. The tools and features associated with Photoshop are second to none. Collaboration and work on common projects become easier with all these features.
