A North Korean diplomat has announced that Kim Jong-un has made another important decision in his talks with South Korea - and that is to abolish the border dividing the two Koreas. The announcement came following a summit between the leaders of the two countries, which saw Kim Jong-un gaining concessions that could allow the hermit state to retain a stockpile of nuclear weapons. In Hanoi, Kim Jong-un also appeared to express an openness to denuclearising the entire peninsula - although it remains unclear how far he is prepared to go. At an annual session of parliament on Wednesday, Kim Jong-un's Foreign Ministry secretary said his country was abolishing the 37-year-old border between North and South Korea. According to the official, Ri Son-gwon, China would be "reassessing" the border. He added: "The process of denuclearisation and the removal of the standoff of the nuclear issue will continue in full accordance with the plan between the two sides." He noted that the process had been the subject of a "heartfelt and warm discussion" with South Korean President Moon Jae-in and other South Korean officials. (Image: REUTERS) (Image: REUTERS) (Image: REUTERS) The move was announced after Mr Kim reportedly expressed his "firm will" to scrap his country's nuclear programme last month. China, which has maintained a close relationship with Kim Jong-un, has promised to work with the new leader of North Korea. But it is not clear if China will follow through on its promise.
