The process of prepping for design can be time-consuming, and when you're working with a timeline, it's easy to overlook a step that can add weeks or months to your project. It's not unusual to spend hours just getting your image board to look perfect before you start any work. Yes, I know it's important to see exactly what you're doing before you start, but when you set a deadline for a project, do yourself a favor: don't waste your time. If you've ever seen a magazine with a photo by a famed photographer in front of an all-white canvas, you know what I'm talking about. You might find it hard to believe that something this uninspiring could actually make it into a magazine, but trust me: design magazines are not lying about their deadlines. In my career, I've worked on a number of projects that resulted in the creation of some amazing images. Some of those images were created with a client directly in front of the camera and on the set. Being able to focus in Photoshop is one of the things I look for in new candidates or designers. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web.
